SUPPORTING EXCELLENCE IN THE PRACTICE OF NEUROLOGY

AAN
NEWS & NOTES

WWW.ALNEUROLOGY.COM

From the President

The Alabama Academy of Neurology is still in the first-year phase of reorganizing and revitalizing our society. As you know, the Medical Association began managing our specialty society last June. The new management relationship between the Alabama Academy of Neurology and the Medical Association will bring quality CME programs, membership recruitment, communications, board management and legislative support to our members.

We hope that you will join your colleagues across the state and support the Alabama Academy of Neurology. We are encouraged that this new partnership will bring more members and allow us to have a stronger voice in matters that affect our profession while allowing us to care for our patients. Dues statements for 2017 were mailed mid-February. You may also download a statement from our website at www.alneurology.com/join-aan. We are working with the American Academy of Neurology to have your state dues included with your national dues through their website. We hope to have that ready by the 2018 dues year to make joining more convenient.

In previous years, the Alabama Academy of Neurology held two meetings each year at USA and UAB. Plans are already in progress to hold an annual meeting on August 12, 2017, in Montgomery, at the Embassy Suites Hotel. It is our hope that holding the meeting in a central location, as well as keeping it at a low cost, will help bolster attendance and allow for the members across the state to better network with one another. We are already working to obtain top notch speakers from USA, UAB, American Academy of Neurology and other entities.

Talk to your colleagues and encourage them to join and attend our meeting on August 12 in Montgomery. Information can also be found on our website at www.alneurology.com/annual-conference.

Sincerely,

Amit Arora MD
President
Alabama Academy of Neurology

Congress ponders Obamacare strategies

Mike Amery, Esq., AAN Senior Legislative Counsel

Republicans ran election campaigns focusing on the repeal of the Affordable Care Act (ACA), also known as “Obamacare” in 2010, 2012, 2014 and 2016. They eventually gained all three legislative legs of government with the House in 2010, the Senate in 2014, and then the presidency in 2016. Now they are working at fulfilling their pledge.

The goal of this Capitol Hill Report is not to discuss the merits of potential changes, but rather, to examine the process that Republicans will try to use to repeal and replace and the defenses that Democrats might be able to employ in opposition.

The main defense Democrats have is that controversial legislation almost always needs a 60-vote supermajority to pass through the Senate. Because Republicans only control 52 votes in the Senate, they cannot outright repeal and replace with an up or down vote. Last week, I had the opportunity to speak with both Speaker Paul Ryan (R-WI) and House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-CA) about their plans. Recognizing the inherent difficulty in getting to 60 votes in the Senate, Ryan and McCarthy plan to use

We will meet at the Embassy Suites, 300 Tallapoosa St, Montgomery, AL 36104. Situated in the heart of historic downtown Montgomery, the Embassy Suites is close to a variety of national historic landmarks. The Union Station Train shed is located next door with many other attractions and restaurants within walking distance.

three separate methods for repealing and replacing the ACA. They are calling the strategy “three buckets.”

Bucket #1 - Reconciliation

Reconciliation is a legislative process that requires only a majority vote in the Senate, but it is restricted to proposals that change a budget deficit or surplus. Republicans passed a budget last month. This opened the door to make changes to the ACA, but only on those provisions that impact the budget. This includes sections such as the individual mandate, the medical device tax, and the Cadillac tax. This part should be easy. However, eliminating some of these provisions will likely be very expensive, which requires spending cuts in other areas or increased revenues, which would mean the unlikely prospect of raising taxes.

Bucket #2 - Department of Health and Human Services (HHS)

The legislation creating the ACA passed by Democrats in 2010 runs 2,700 pages. The word “secretary” appears in the ACA more than 3,000 times. This means that the secretary of HHS is given wide discretion on interpreting and implementing many of the ACA's provisions. A perfect example of this was the ACA's “Medicaid bump” which allowed the Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS), a division of HHS, to expand the bonus to all internal medicine subspecialties, but not neurology, psychiatry, or OB/GYNs.

President Trump's nominee for HHS secretary is Rep. Tom Price, MD, (R-GA) who is a former orthopaedic surgeon. Assuming he takes the reigns at HHS, his first priority is likely to begin unraveling Obamacare through the 3,000 times his office is mentioned in the ACA.

Bucket #3 - Legislation

Anything that doesn't impact the budget and cannot be affected by the HHS secretary will have to pass both houses of Congress and will be subject to the Senate's 60-vote requirement. This includes popular programs like requiring insurance to cover pre-existing conditions and allowing children to remain on their parent's health insurance until age 26, as well as more controversial issues like insurance coverage mandates. This will require compromise and may be very difficult.

The AAN has heard from many members concerned about how any repeal and replace plans might impact their patients and all Americans. In response, the AAN's Government Relations Committee has drafted principles for AAN positions. These principles include important AAN priorities such as ensuring appropriate health care coverage for all Americans, appropriately valuing the cognitive care that neurologists provide, and reducing regulatory burdens on all physicians. The AAN Board of Directors is considering the principles now and I hope to write about the specifics in the next issue of Capitol Hill Report.

Both Speaker Ryan and Majority Leader McCarthy stressed to me that they believe Obamacare has serious structural flaws and will collapse without changes. They say their goal is not to cause people to lose coverage, it is to create structural integrity. They are committed to “getting it right.” As they move forward, the AAN will be ready to weigh on the priorities of AAN members and the patients they serve.

“Repeal and Replace” Obamacare: How Will All of This Sort Itself Out?

A Health Care Reform Blog – Bob Laszewski’s (Jan. 17) review of the latest developments in federal health policy, health care reform, and marketplace activities in the health care financing business.

Will the Republicans Follow Through on Their Promise to Repeal Obamacare?

Yes.

You have probably been reading press stories that bring into question whether or not Republicans will actually keep their campaign promise to “repeal” the Affordable Care Act (ACA). In fact, there is much discussion going on among Congressional Republicans about repealing key funding elements of the ACA as part of a budget process prior to having a replacement ready to pass the Congress.

But, they will defund the core elements of Obamacare sooner rather than later on their way to replacement. They have to. Repealing Obamacare as a first priority was a core campaign promise. If Congressional Republicans and President Trump fail to do this they will suffer a precipitous drop in credibility with their base.

Do Republicans Have a Replacement Plan?

Yes – at least a pretty specific outline for what they would do.

Speaker Paul Ryan’s “Better Way” outline, last year’s very similar Burr, Hatch, Upton bill, and a number of other similar Republican proposals lay out a clear path for a preferred Republican alternative. Donald Trump said this weekend that his plan, likely very similar to these, will be released once his new Secretary of HHS is confirmed.

These plans share the same key elements but have not yet been put in legislative form or been “scored.” Just exactly what the new subsidy/tax credit scheme would look like and how it would impact consumers compared to what we now have in Obamacare is the biggest unknown.

The problem isn’t that they don’t have a plan. The problem is that Republicans don’t have a plan that will garner the required 60 votes in the U.S. Senate to become law. With 52 Republicans, they will need at least eight Democrats to join them. There simply are not the eight Democrats, or a guarantee that all 52 Republicans can be counted on, to ensure something like the general Republican replacement outline can become law.

Does This Mean That Republicans Will Retreat on Repeal Until Such Time as They Can Secure the Needed Democratic Support?

No.

First, Republicans are now in so deep on the repeal promise they can’t retreat and maintain credibility with their Republican/Trump base.

Second, the reality is that Washington, DC, wouldn’t be able to find a bipartisan route to get past gridlock on such a complex and politically charged issue as Obamacare without facing hard deadlines for replacement.

Those that argue that Republicans should first have the replacement plan in place before proceeding make the assumption that without the imperative repeal/defund would create the two sides would be able to come to a bipartisan solution. In this Washington, DC? I just don’t see that happening.

But Hasn’t the Republican “Repeal and Replace” Strategy Now Put Them on the Defensive?

Yes.

Republicans are clearly losing the messaging battle with Democrats now on the offensive. A lack of a clear message about replacement creates a huge information gap that is easy to fill with bleak assessments for how the health insurance market will quickly collapse in the wake of Republican defunding.

Right now, Democrats are effectively, but disingenuously, arguing that repeal without a replacement will lead to millions of people losing their insurance. Disingenuous because Republicans have never intended to repeal without a seamless transition to replacement. But the Democratic arguments just had gasoline poured on them by the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) which today estimated that repeal without replace would eventually add 32 million to the uninsured.

But Republicans have only themselves to blame for losing the messaging because they so far haven’t been able to fill the information vacuum with the detail for what they will do.

Don’t Republicans Now Need to Put a Detailed Bill on the Table In Order to Assure Voters?

No.

They need to detail a series of commitments complete with a timeline for how repeal, transition, and replace will look and how it will provide insurance security.

Vague Republican assurances that there will be an orderly transition and that people won’t lose their coverage whither in the face of all kinds of bad scenarios the Democrats are and will be coming up with. Republicans have now let the Democrats take what had been their worst domestic issue over the past six years and turn the tables on the Republicans. Bad start for Republicans.

The final bill will be the result of complex negotiations first inside the Republican caucus and then with Democrats. But people need to know the Republican bottom line. What is the minimum that consumers can expect and over what timeline?

Republicans are now looking at a strategy to introduce a series of piecemeal Obamacare replacements to be voted on in the near term – some under budget rules as they complete the next 2018 budget and some requiring 60 Senate votes – thereby forcing Democrats to vote against what could be popular alternatives one at a time. But even this strategy will hit snags – for example repealing Obamacare’s popular preexisting condition reform and replacing it with a lesser Republican “continuous coverage” provision that would require 60 Senate votes.
